MINIMUM PUBLIC SHAREHOLDING – DOES IT REALLY NEED TO BE INCREASED?

Hon'ble Finance Minister in her budget speech on 5 Jul '19 has said that 'it is the right time to consider increasing minimum public shareholding in listed companies'.

No rationale has been mentioned for this suggestion, though it is against the global trend of 10% to 25% in developed markets, but various market experts have opined that an increase in the global weightage of Indian stocks as per rating agencies like MSCI, etc. may be intended, hoping that this would encourage a greater interest and investment in Indian listed shares by overseas investors, exchange traded funds, etc. with a commensurate inflow of foreign currency. As far as Long Term Capital Gains on promoter stake sale is considered, if we consider the 'grandfathering' provisions of the current law, the likely tax on the gain from the effective date would be too minuscule to be a credible revenue objective. Mention also has been made of the price discovery rationale. This argument is also weak because price depends on supply and demand as well as a host of other factors such as the state of the country's economy as well as its future prospects and more fundamentally, the performance of the company, but more supply, alone, will not ensure better price discovery. A company will not be less valuable or the shares more affordable just because more shares are made available to the public. In fact, for well-run companies, their shares will always be in demand. Supply will meet demand at the 'discovered' price, even at current levels of public shareholding.

In my years of interaction with investors, analysts, bankers and members of the general public the fundamental clarity that each of these investor/stakeholder groups seek from me, without exception, are on following issues:

- 'Skin in the Game' by promoters – is there a planned continuity of interest and therefore long term involvement of the promoter group – is the next generation actively involved? How committed are we, as a family and as a group to the future of the company?
- Do the promoters ever consider a 'cashing out' to large overseas MNC's perhaps, as a long term objective, or if the price is right? Do the promoters want to retire or opt out of active involvement, at some stage?
- Do the promoters personally assess and validate 'big ticket' investments and strategic shifts?

I have always replied as fairly as I could, keeping in mind, compliance with regulatory norms but their questions, in my view, are quite indicative of the reliance they place on responsible promoter involvement.

What I have heard, repeatedly, is that they have spare funds for allocation in Indian equities but it is a challenge for them to find enough good companies to invest in. The shortage is not that of "share scrips" but that of reliable companies where their monies can be invested. Such investors are naturally looking for profit which is their main objective.

They will invest in companies where they expect an upside in the future based on their track record of sustained good performance. They prefer companies focused on their core competences and companies where promoters have a significant stake. Serious investors including foreign investors do not appreciate promoters whose attention and resources, including financial ones, are diverted. They study the allocation outlook record of promoters and companies and prefer those who allocate their resources into their core competences. They expect to see value creation in such companies irrespective of quantum of public float.

It is my firm belief that if a study were to be done today on value creation for shareholders of listed companies it would be evident that companies with an increasing or steady trend for promoter stakeholding would show significantly better and sustained results over those companies with a decreasing stake.

It therefore seems to me clearly counterintuitive to dilute what informed investors see as a source of strength and continuing performance in the hope that improved availability will attract overseas institutional investors.

Foreign institutional investors, particularly, are not happy with frequently 'shifting goalposts' either – it inhibits their ability to plan out longer term strategies for investment. They are also concerned with country risk, currency volatility as other proximate factors shaping their investment appetite. They usually deal with other people's money – including those of retirement benefit plans. It has been my experience that they prefer a stable environment of laws and policies rather than a frequently changing one, which actually makes them nervous and risk averse.

There are companies, both in the public sector and private sector, which will be affected by this diktat, if it materialises. However, a large section of PSU's has not yet been able to achieve the dilution target and is living on borrowed time. Quite a few private sector companies have faced penalties. It is the well run private sector companies who have complied and will hurry to meet the timeline resulting in a loss of wealth to, and, in many cases, the active interest of, the promoters.

In my view, long term creation of wealth through maximum leveraging of core competences, under the stewardship of a professional management and responsible promoter group, benefits the economy and minority shareholders alike. If the company is managed well with demonstrated and consistent results, overseas investor interest will automatically result, as a consequence, and not because free float has suddenly increased. If the company is managed poorly no amount of free float will help shore up the value or attract investment.
